

My Public Service Philosophy

"By engaging citizens, we can make the best decisions possible for their community. We should always keep the people we're planning for in mind at all times – the people who will live with the choices we make in their everyday lives." -Bree Robinson

My personal philosophy is to always consider how my decisions can and will impact others. This bleeds into every facet of my life - including my public service career. As a public servant, it will be my job to make decisions for the betterment of the whole community. Public servants often find themselves speaking on behalf of the community and for those without a large voice behind them. By engaging citizens and encouraging as much public participation as possible, I'll be able to make informed and sensitive decisions on behalf of all groups in the community. It is important to keep in mind that a small decision I help facilitate could change someone else's day to day life in a small or large way. It's nearly impossible to please every member of the community, but I believe that this mindset is still something worth striving for. It's my goal to engage and utilize the opinion of citizens, so that I always keep in mind who I am speaking for.
